Intellectual focus and commitment

In general: Historiography and World History. Doctoral concentration was on the self-particularisations of 20th century Turkish nationalist historians, especially over the “non-feudal nature,” so-called, of the Ottoman social formation. This led into a certain cultural intimacy with the inner codes of Turkish nationalism in general. Thus, broader research interests have come to cover : the initial construction of Turkish national memory in the early 20th century; the Young Turks’ and the Kemalist revolutions in comparative perspective; the role of ethnic cleansings, atrocities and genocides in revolutions and nation-building; the construction of national forgetting, self-exoneration or denial. Work from the 1990s to the 2010s included: comparative studies and critiques of nationalist textbooks and history education, as well as attempts to create alternative textbooks and teachers’ resource files, both for Turkey and Southeast Europe.
